As the Asian private banking and wealth management industry goes through various degrees of recalibration and strategic rethinking, we were delighted to host this pre-eminent forum focusing primarily on family wealth structures, succession planning and the future client generations.

Advancing the science and the art of family wealth and succession planning requires immense expertise from the Asian wealth management and advisory community, be they private bankers, asset managers, wealth planners, life insurers, lawyers, accountants, residence advisers and any of the other key players in this industry.

Are the private bankers and other wealth management firms up to the task, or do they need to significantly refocus their businesses and substantially enhance their skills and expertise? How do they make money out of these developments, and how do they incentivise their bankers and advisers, who have hitherto been highly focused on product sales? We learnt this is not always an easy balancing act for the clients or for the wealth management professionals.

Trusts and trust structures are solutions that many advisers and lawyers promote, but to be effective, they must be professionally structured and managed by experts, and they must be at a distance from the originators. This places even greater emphasis on the credibility of the structures, the trustees, and of course of the jurisdictions in which these vehicles are housed. ■
